Act 3 Scene 1

I feel that the movie version of this scene is more powerful. The reason I feel this way is because the movie makes it seem more realistic than the stage version does. This is because in the stage version, it's the same setting the whole time up to this point. However, in the movie the setting changes all the time to make everything seem real. Also in the movie, they have music and sounds that contribute to the scene to make it more dramatic and more realistic. I do however think that the stage version better serves Shakespeare's original intent. I think this because Shakespeare wrote things for the stage, as movies were not a thing back then as they are now.
